INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE STATES AND MUNICIPALITIES

I. THE FEDERAL GRANT-IN-AID PROGRAMS FOR THE FISCAL YEAR 1950

FEBRUARY 15 (legislative day, JANUARY 29), 1951.—Ordered to be printed

Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, submitted the following

REPORT OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE TO STUDY INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments had before it for consideration, on February 15, 1951, the report of the subcommittee relative to its study of intergovernmental relationships between the United States and the States and municipalities. Upon consideration of the report as submitted, the report of said subcommittee was approved by the full Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the chairman of the subcommittee being directed to transmit a copy to the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

The Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations in the course of its continuous study of relationships between the United States and the States and municipalities as required by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 finds it desirable to review the Federal grant-in-aid programs to determine whether the objectives are being realized, and the extent to which each of the 48 States is participating. Previous reports covering the subject matter of Federal grants-in-aid have to a large extent been weakened by the absence of a clean-cut definition of what constitutes a "grant-in-aid," and therefore the Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations before beginning its report would like to set forth what it believes to be the most complete definition yet produced. This is the definition of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch which was included in its report entitled "Federal-State Relations."

Grants-in-aid is a term used to define a method of operation whereby funds derived from a tax levied and collected by one level of Government are made available for expenditure and administration by another level, usually upon a matching basis, for some particular activity, and in accordance with definite and specific standards and requirements.

The acceptance of this definition automatically precludes any and all direct payments to individuals by the Federal Government. Thus a whole series of programs sometimes included as Federal grants-in-aid are properly excluded. Notable among these are the Veterans' Readjustment Benefits program and the National Guard program, which on occasion have been included in other Federal grant-in-aid surveys. In the fiscal year 1949, the Veterans' Readjustment Benefits program was almost twice that of all other Federal grants-in-aid, veterans' benefits totaling $3,296,862,993, while all Federal grants-in-aid totaled $1,854,789,515.

Federal grants-in-aid have today become an integral part of the fabric of our Government, but still constitute a rather small part in that they presently account for less than 4 percent of Federal expenditures.

Due to the extensive publicity given Federal grants-in-aid it is often overlooked that this method is not utilized exclusively by the Federal Government. Percentagewise the States use it more extensively than the Federal Government, 40 percent of the moneys expended by local governments being derived from State grants-in-aid.

The primary objective of the subcommittee in rendering this report is to provide the Senate with a thoroughgoing analysis of the role of the Federal "grant-in-aid" in present-day government at all levels.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments had before it for consideration on February 15, 1951, the report of the subcommittee relative to its study of intergovernmental relations between the United States and the States and municipalities. Upon consideration of the report as submitted, the report of said subcommittee was approved by the full Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the chairman of the subcommittee being directed to transmit a copy to the Senate.

INTRODUCTION

The Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations in the course of its continuous study of relationships between the United States and the States and municipalities as required by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 has it desirable to review the Federal grant-in-aid programs to determine whether the objectives are being realized, and the extent to which each of the 48 States is participating. Previous reports covering the subject matter of Federal grants-in-aid have to a large extent been weakened by the absence of a clear-cut definition of what constitutes "grant-in-aid," and therefore the Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations before beginning its report would like to set forth what it believes to be the most complete definition yet proposed. This is the definition of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch which was included in its report entitled "Federal-State Relations."

Grants-in-aid is a term used to define a method of operation whereby funds derived from a tax levied and collected by one level of Government are made their own programs without Federal assistance. The second view-point is that so long as we have a Federal system of Government, it remains one of the primary functions of that system that certain public services should be maintained so that whether a person happens to live in the State of California or in the State of New York, he should have the same standard of living.

CHAPTER I. THE PRESENT DAY ROLE OF FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID

Today, Federal grants-in-aid have become an integral part of the fabric of our Government. However, they still constitute a very small part of that fabric in that in the fiscal year 1949, before defense mobilization, they amounted to less than 6 percent of total Federal expenditures, while in the fiscal year 1952, with a $71,594,000,000 budget, that percentage drops to 4 percent. In 1916, local government collected 65 percent of all taxes, while State government collected 12 percent, and the Federal Government collected 23 percent. The Federal Government now collects 72 percent of all governmental revenue; local government collects 14 percent; and State Government collects 14 percent. Thus, it is obvious that the positions of Federal and local government have been more than reversed in less than 40 years.

Federal grants-in-aid today are considered as a most consequential source of revenue, and without them State and local government would find it extremely difficult to render their citizens the services to which they have become accustomed. The small percentage of the national revenue which they presently constitute is largely a result of the extremely large defense program, but even without this program, except in the period of the depression thirties, they have never constituted over 6 percent of the national budget. Without Federal grants-in-aid, both State and local government would find it necessary to either further increase existing taxes, or enter new fields of taxation.

In order to fully understand the present day role of Federal grants-in-aid, one must first understand the purposes for which Federal grants-in-aid came into being.

The purposes of a Federal grant-in-aid, almost without regard to type, are to—

(a) Inspire the State to action in fields which are of concern to the entire Nation. The action desired is primarily of a financial nature.

(b) Provide combined financial support and administration of programs of national interest.

(c) Establish a "parity" among the States where needed services of a national character are involved.

(d) Complement inadequate State and local revenue.

CHAPTER II. THE FUTURE ROLE OF FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID

The future role of Federal grants-in-aid is still in the realm of political theory. There are two basic schools of thought concerning Federal grants-in-aid. The first, being the viewpoint of a substantial number of the States, that they would prefer that the Federal Government relinquish some of its taxing power to enable them to carry on their own programs without Federal assistance. The second view-point is that so long as we have a Federal system of Government, it remains one of the primary functions of that system that certain public services should be maintained so that whether a person happens to live in the State of California or in the State of New York, he should have the same standard of living. In addition to the various methods of service, the grant-in-aid method has raised the level of all aided services, without transferring functions entirely to the Federal Government. The grant-in-aid method, in fact, has added to and expanded the activities of State governments by contributing to their resources and thereby enabling their own programs without Federal assistance. The second viewpoint is, that so long as we have a Federal system of Government, it remains one of the primary tenets of that system that certain public service standards be maintained, so that whether a person becomes old in the State of Alabama or in the State of California, the benefits to which he is entitled, based upon his contributions to an old-age assistance program, will not vary to any substantial degree. The same philosophy may be extended to each of the 40 Federal grant-in-aid programs, in that whether one is traveling by automobile in the State of Mississippi or in the State of New York on a Federal highway, the variation in the quality of that highway will not be excessive. The philosophy of those who are opposed to grants-in-aid generally resolves itself into the argument that State and local programs are best administered exclusively at the State and local level. This argument is a good one, provided that the subject local government is capable of raising the revenue necessary to administer its own programs, and has the technical assistance and facilities.

Almost all authorities will agree that Federal grants-in-aid are "here to stay," and that properly legislated, integrated, and administered they will serve to strengthen our Federal Union, and preserve local governmental autonomy.

CHAPTER III. THE ATTAINED OBJECTIVES OF FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID

There is little doubt that Federal grants-in-aid have "quickened the pulse" of State and local government to the national importance of rendering these local services immediately on a consequential scale, rather than having them come into being slowly and irregularly. A byproduct of Federal grants-in-aid has been a more intimate relationship between Federal, State, and local officials in rendering services which otherwise would have been participated in by only one level of Government rather than two or three levels of Government. The advantage of being able to utilize the vast research and experience of the Federal Government is still another byproduct of Federal grants-in-aid.

Essentially the Federal grant-in-aid device is not a device designed to extend centralization of Government, but rather a device within which local governmental autonomy and administration is maintained, and the superior fiscal capacity of the Federal Government is utilized. Due to a series of unfortunate instances, Federal grants-in-aid, in many quarters, have become a synonym of further centralization. This is unfortunate, but almost always a product of development.

The Hoover Commission's report on Federal-State Relations sets forth the attained objectives in the following language:

(a) The cooperative system based on grants-in-aid has provided needed standards of public services throughout the country in many fields—services that many States would be unable to supply. It has provided for some redistribution of resources from States that have superior means to those that lack them.

(b) The plan has developed a division of responsibility: the National Government giving financial aid and establishing broad standards—the State governments sharing the fiscal burden and maintaining primary responsibility for administration. In addition to decreasing inequalities of service, the grant-in-aid method has raised the level of all aided services, without transferring functions entirely to the National Government.

(c) The grant-in-aid method, in fact, has added to and expanded the activities of State governments by contributing to their resources and thereby enabling them to embark upon additional or more extensive public-service programs for their own people.

(d) It has stimulated States and localities to provide a number of public services deemed necessary and desirable in the national interest.

(e) The cooperative method has improved the administration of many State activities. National administrative standards, as in highway and welfare programs, and national advice, as in police work, have done much to increase the professional skill and effectiveness of State administrators.

Today, few administrative officials of either State or local government would either deny the contribution which Federal grants-in-aid have made to the vigor of local government, nor would they deny that Federal grants-in-aid have been a primary factor in the preservation of the democratic features of our Federal system of government.

CHAPTER IV. UNATTAINED OBJECTIVES OF FEDERAL GRANTS-IN-AID

The unattained objectives of Federal grants-in-aid have also been summarized most recently by the Hoover Commission in the following manner:

(a) Grant programs are unrelated; they are uncoordinated; and they have developed in a haphazard manner without any one agency—Federal or State—concerned with the over-all impact and the over-all effects of grants-in-aid upon the general operations of government.

(b) The grant-in-aid method has removed large areas of discretionary power from the hands of State officials and has transferred a measurable degree of policy making and ultimate responsibility and control for public services to the National Government.

(c) Grants-in-aid have altered State service patterns and total State programs. Available Federal funds for matching purposes stimulate or "persuade" the States in many instances to expend large sums for an aided program while, of necessity, other needed services are neglected. The public assistance program as contrasted with the general relief program is one among many examples.

(d) In order to provide funds for grants-in-aid, and to adjust to war and depression, the national system of taxation has been expanded until we have extensive overlapping and conflicts on the part of Federal, State, and local governments. Of greater importance to State and local governments, the national need for revenue has caused the Congress in some instances to utilize productive tax sources that could be used just as effectively by State or local governments. In this manner, the circle widens. Under pressure to meet needs, Congress appropriates more for grants. In order to secure necessary revenues, the national tax base is expanded which makes it more difficult for State and local governments to secure their own revenue, and hence stimulates pressure from more and more groups for more and more grants.

(e) Federal grants-in-aid retard and repress the initiative of the States in financing the growing needs of State and local government, because such grants frequently result in rewarding those States which avoid their responsibility and in penalizing those which accept it.

The basis of the charge that there is excessive rigidity in Federal grants-in-aid and that they lack cohesion and consistency, is that almost all of the 40 Federal grants have been created separately, are being administered separately, and are appropriated for separately, regardless of whether they are related programs, or whether they would best be administered collectively. For example, we find that although general health assistance, maternal and child-health service, tuberculosis control, venereal-disease control, mental-health activities, cancer control, heart-disease control, and water-pollution control are all health programs, each is administered separately.

In the field of vocational education, we find the office of vocational rehabilitation, cooperative vocational education, cooperative agricultural extension work, supervision of veterans on-the-job training, and colleges for agriculture and mechanical arts are not only administered separately, but often by separate agencies.

The substance of the statement that too much reliance in the allocation of Federal grants-in-aid has been placed in complicated formulas or Federal administrative discretion, is undoubtedly due to the fact that formulas inherently are arbitrary and, therefore, administrative action based upon them can be on occasion, little else. There are several programs, however, in which the States have considerable discretion in the apportionment of funds. Examples are certain components of public health and child welfare services, agricultural and marketing research, airport development, forest-fire protection, and unemployment compensation. Generally speaking, the argument that reliance on complicated formulas, or on administrative discretion, in the administration of Federal grants-in-aid is excessive, is something of a "damned if you do, damned if you don't" proposition.

As has been previously mentioned, during the period of the thirties, Federal grants-in-aid reached their highest point, percentagewise, in relation to the national budget, and it was at this time that considerable discretion was granted the States in the apportionment of unemployment relief funds.

The statement that Federal grants-in-aid overstimulate aided services through their matching requirements has substance, particularly in grants to dependent children, the blind, and the aged. Those States which are fiscally able to pay larger benefits, thus are able to secure larger grants. However, since 1948, the Federal Government has taken steps to correct this situation by contributing a larger share of the particular type of benefit, up to a given amount, and an equal share of the excess, to a given maximum. There still exists, however, wide discrepancies between the States in the benefits which are dispensed in the public-assistance field. These inequities, which are a result of "matching," also exist to a large degree in the highway program.

It is obvious that the "matching" system is necessary in order to prevent excessive expenditures of public funds, but at the same time, it is also obvious that the mechanics of the matching system should be altered to provide for basic differences in the fiscal capacity of given States, or geographical areas.

The charge that Federal grants-in-aid resist budgetary control cannot be completely refuted, in that the use of formulas and earmarked moneys do have a tendency to curtail coordinated planning and management. The Hoover Commission's statement that "undue interference with State and local administration in matters which are of no national concern," is one of the byproducts of Federal grant-in-aid programs, but is probably the natural result of the introduction of any Federal jurisdiction. The Hoover Commission field research indicates that with the same program in an area of the same character, relations between Federal, State, and local officials range from excellent to poor. Essentially, the solution to this problem probably lies in the public-relations field.

The statement that Federal grants-in-aid have a tendency to shift State and local fiscal responsibilities to the Federal Government, does have some basis of fact. Increased Federal taxes, largely a result of the defense effort, directly harry the efforts of State and local government to make the maximum tax effort for the maintenance of their own public services. Unfortunately there seems to be little that can be done to ameliorate this circumstance. Suggestions of a Federal sales tax would only serve to aggravate the difficulty.

The concluding argument that Federal grants-in-aid have an adverse effect upon our federal form of government, has as its essence excessive central fiscal control. While it is true that the Federal Government is currently securing in excess of 72 percent of all governmental revenue, as against 23 percent in 1916, it is fallacious to conclude that this domination of governmental revenue is a result of Federal grants-in-aid. Actually, World War II expenditures, and the post World War II defense program, have been almost completely responsible for this situation. It is accurate to say that the temporary relief grant-in-aid programs which existed during the period of the depression thirties might have been a step in the direction of excessive central fiscal control, but being completely of a temporary or emergency nature, and having been dispensed with upon the conclusion of that emergency, no appreciable effect is recognizable today.
